In medieval Europe, marriages were arranged to ensure peace between warring families. The Templars were of the higher nobility, so in order to cement peace with their enemies, the Templars had to marry into the royal family. The Templars were notorious for this because they were good fighters, and so often decided to fight and die on the front lines, rather than return to the home lands. They were married into the royal family in England, France, and Austria, to keep the peace. John of Ibelin was the father of Balian, who later married the Templar Blanche of Anjou, and on their marriage, assumed the title and lands of Jaffa. Thus, the family was founding member of the Kingdom of Jerusalem. It was under John of Ibelin and Balian that the dynasty of the Kings of Jerusalem would be founded. They also had three older brothers who also married into the royal family, and thus another part of the family line would be created. These older brothers married into the royal family of England, Scotland, and France, thus cementing the relationship between the Holy Land and the royal families of the European nations. Thus, the family first gained the title "King of Jerusalem" in 1131, at the time of the Babylonian captivity. However, it would be another century later that the last of the brothers, Bohemund would actually claim the throne. Rome was at war with Lombardy, and the pope had just excommunicated the Count of Milan. The Count was a champion of the Greeks, and was also allied with the Catholic German empire. The pope requested the help of the French king to help in the war, and the French king sent his brother-in-law, the Duke of Burgundy, in charge of the mission. One of the brothers-in-law of the Count of Milan was the Capetian King Philip Augustus, who decided to accept the job of helping to organize the campaign. Philip Augustus wanted to avenge the murder of his father, Louis VII, and he also wanted to get back at his rival and later son-in-law, the King of France, Philip the Bold. The duke began planning the attack, and he sent a force of knights to the south of
